description	The work draws on an archaic visual language in which material, texture and earthy colour tones function as carriers of depth and time. The surface appears like a sedimented fragment that retains traces of a past process and at the same time remains in a state of becoming. Colour and structure condense into a multi-layered, almost geological presence in which dissolution and form-finding are inextricably interwoven. In this reduction to material essence, a space opens up in which transience and transformation are not depicted, but can be felt.
